Course Description

This course will examine how to improve the effectiveness of clinical practice by reducing occupational hazards in behavioral health professionals. Providers must be aware of the implications, such as potential risks to clients, ineffective clinical interventions, and a negative therapeutic relationship, resulting from these conditions. Behavioral health professionals must be prepared to recognize the signs and symptoms and take steps to ameliorate conditions that can lead to impaired clinical practice. The impact to clients resulting from occupational hazards experienced by behavioral health professionals can also lead to unethical practices and harm to clients. This course will review the most common occupational hazards in clinical practice. It will reference best practices and ethical guidelines to help prevent harm to clients. The course includes clinical practices, interventions, and self-care management strategies (such as mindfulness) that can be utilized to maintain effective clinical practice. Clinicians will learn about the connection between effective client care and self-care management.
